

Most Credible Source of Information: Pharmacists, Physicians, or the Internet?

A study by researchers at the UNC Eshelman School of Pharmacy found that patients taking vasculitis medication see physicians and the Internet as more credible sources for medication information than pharmacists. A look at some of the study's findings.

How often patients used each source of information on vasculitis medication in the past year

How patients perceived the credibility of each source regarding information on vasculitis medication

How often people turned to each source for each type of vasculitis medication information

